Labour Market Information

The labour market explains how many jobs are available in different types of industry such as health and social care, education, medicine or aerospace. It's always changing based on what businesses need and what's happening in the world around them.

Even small changes—like a company opening or closing—can have a big impact on local jobs.

Education and training affect the labour market. If there are too few trained personnel, skills shortages will result in more jobs available in certain industries; if there are too many people trained in one area, there will not be enough jobs for everyone.

The Labour Market is usually broken down into occupations and locations. To find where there are available jobs in your location, you need to understand how your skills relate to other occupations so that if you can find lots of different roles in your chosen industry.

Special effects (SFX) make-up artist

Special effects (SFX) make-up artists specialise in making other-worldly characters, or gore, look realistic in film or TV.

What you'll do:

- applying make-up to performers
- creating prosthetics such as fake limbs or fake facial features
- making small models or mock-ups of what you will be aiming to create on the performers
- meeting with your Head of Department or other design teams to discuss the director's artistic vision
- travelling to film sets in remote locations
- touching up make-up throughout filming as weather and lighting conditions change

Working hours and environment

You'll normally work freelance, which means you'll be given a temporary contract for each TV production or film you work on. This can mean some very busy periods, as well as some much quieter ones in between contracts.

Working days can be long, and you'll need to be flexible. Filming can start very early in the morning or run late into the evening.
