Nutritionists use their scientific knowledge of food to give information and advice about the effects of diet and nutrition on health and wellbeing.

What you'll do:

You'll work closely with dieticians and other health professionals, like pharmacists, GPs, and hospital or community diet and nutrition teams.

Your day-to-day duties might include:

- practical nutrition research projects
- recruiting volunteers to take part in trials
- processing and analysing biological samples
- raising awareness and educating colleagues in the health field
- aiming healthy eating campaigns at particular groups
- helping individual people to make positive food choices
- giving information and advice to sports professionals on how diet can improve their performance and recovery
- planning menus for individuals and groups of people (e.g. for school meals, sports teams, and residential homes)

Working hours and environment

As an employee, you'll usually work Monday to Friday, 9am to 5pm. If you work on a freelance basis, you may need to be more flexible and work evenings and weekends. Either way, you'll need to manage your own time carefully and be punctual to attend appointments on time.

You could work in hospitals, local health clinics, or doctors' surgeries. You may sometimes need to travel within the local area to children's centres, schools, nurseries, and community centres. You'll spend most of your time with other people.
